FEATURE BREED

CAMPINE

The Campine breed was developed in the Campine country of Belgium, where it has been bred for centuries. It was developed for white egg production. The sexes are identical in color pattern and sometimes the males are hen-feathered. Campines come in two varieties, Silver and Golden.

Hen-feathering is when the male bird does not develop the typical long sickle feathers of a rooster, the pointed hackle (neck) feathers, or the pointed saddle feathers which hang in front of the tail.

The Campine has the same basic ancestry as the Braekel, coming as it did originally from the sandy plains of Belgium in the Antwerp district. There are only two colours standardised in the Campine - the Silver and the Gold.

The Gold Campine in both the female and the male has a head and neck hackle of rich gold, with the rest of the body being beetle-green barring on a rich gold ground. In the Silver Campine, both male and female have a head and neck hackle of pure white, with the rest of the body being marked as it is in the Gold. In both sexes the beak is horn coloured, the eyes are dark brown with a black pupil and the comb, face and wattles are bright red. Ear lobes must be white and the legs and feet a leaden blue. Toenails are horn coloured.

Back in 1899, the breed was sufficiently popular in the UK to have its own breed club established that year, and the bird played a very important part in work on the autosexing breeds. As part of the experiments at Cambridge by genetic workers, Gold Campine were crossed with Barred Rock to produce the Cambar as early as 1929. Day old Cambar chicks showed sex distinction by having different colours in the down for the male and female.

In the 1930's the Silver Campine was included in both the set of Players cigarette cards and the set of Anglian Mixture cards. On the reverse of the Players card the breed is described as "a small active breed which enjoys great popularity, being bred in two colours, silver and gold."

Broad in the body with a rather long back narrowing to the tail, this is a breed with a full round breast and a tail carried fairly high. The hen has a single comb which falls over to one side of her face and she lays a white egg. The Large Fowl male weighs around 2.70 kg (6 lbs) and the female weighs 2.25 kg (5 lbs). In the Bantam, the male weighs 680 g (24 ozs) and the female weighs 570 g (20 ozs). Not one of the more extreme looking breeds, but a useful one for its white eggs.

Could the Campine represent a small farm venture awaiting the ambitious rare breed enthusiast?
